Theories of World-Making.

According to the crude opinions prevailg during the infancy of modern science, atter and motion were all required for calling a world into existence; but it was moved with a certain order and regularity, they could never have risen from the chaotic to the cosmical condition. As all the planets move around the sun in the same direction, Laplace was led to believe that n remote times all must have been conected together; and such a primitive con-lection might be afforded if the sun and nection might be afforded if the sun and his attendants were originally a vast fire-mist, their matter being so much attenuated by heat that it extended far beyond its boundaries of the solar domain. He supposed that such an immense rarefied mass, or being set in motion by some cause which he does not specify, would ultimately be compelled by its own friction and by gravity to rotate with a purity of the solar domain. He working!

"You cannot, dear," she answered. "Besides, I am not worth it. If Roger came back, he would not love me. How can we fight destiny? I am carried on by it. I cannot resist it!"

The ungodly reasoning of this man already working!

"And you love him?"

She did not seem to feel the reproach in my tone. Her eyes were sadly bent up in tion and by gravity to rotate with a uniform angular velocity in all its parts and around a common centre. LEONOR.

IV.—CONTINUED.

The dead silence which fell between us seemed to me to stretch out with an expression of its own—a cry of anguish to her absent lover. I could see him standing before me, saying in his tender, manly voice, "Keep her for m., Agnes!" In an instant his desolate future rose before me, and for a moment I dared not trust myself to calling a world into existence; but it is soon found that, unless in the beginning, the materials which formed the solar system speak, but knelt down, taking her cold little hands in mine.

The dreadful idea took possession of me, and made every moment a new agony; and, at last, unable to control myself in Leonor's presence, I went down into the hallway where the Misses Newton, of Worcester, were chatting amiably before the fire. The gay voices, pretty groupings, the light rise and fall of laughter, jarred upon me painfully, but in some way they made my apprehensions and fears seem for the moment theatrical. THE Duke of Bedford, the owner of the Brown, and what sort of quarters have you

The newspapers have been giving an account in a somewhat sensational fashior of a poor girl in Hamilton professing to be weary of life, and anxious only for rest, though at the bottom of the lake. Farevell letters were published with appropriate comments, and there were some strong denniciations, not to say anything of the usual tears of sympathy. Would it not have been better to have wait d some little time before publishing such a sensational narrative so as to be quite sure that the young woman was adually dead? It does not add another encouragement to life to have the whole of her pitiful experience made known to the wold. She has had shame and mortification sufficient without having so much more added to the sum by the increased notoriety she as received. Let us heave that the young woman was a formally a poor girl in Hamilton professing to be and visited by a most 'spectable young man and visited by a most 'spectable young man in the 'orse artillery, and with a fortnight's character from her last place, but who alto-gether does not exactly suit).
