

The seventeenth of February

Dear,

You see I have not overcome the habit of writing "brief ones" to my friends, just before their return to town.

I am so glad that my suggestions met with your approval, and I'm hoping that the following one will – You said that you are coming to Newark early Tuesday afternoon. Now I'd love to have you come right up

The "right" means without going home first.

Am I not a naughty child?

here, and have dinner with us. Probably you won't have time to let me know, but anyway, I am going to take your answer for granted, and expect you. I knew this is terribly selfish, but your mother and your other friends will have you for four days, and I want to make the most of my two.

Thank goodness the old exams are over. I hated to think of your having to work so hard during those days.

I am so anxious for the next couple of days
to pass quickly, as I can hardly wait to see my Artie.

Hastily, sincerely, affectionately
and a lot of other things,
